Description

Public policy in general tends to be continuous, guaranteeing the institutionalization of its own cultural environment. However, in an environment as changing as the current one, it could be enriching to take a look at new cultural practices that go hand in hand, that are recognized, but are not situated within the usual practice of cultural policy. The course aims to give insights that serve to reflect on how to broaden the margins of cultural policy through different forms of consumption and cultural creation. It addresses the window of opportunities of digitization and the virtual or online offer or how cultural policy can affect areas such as mental health.

Objectives

Reflect on the areas of action, content, of local public policy in Culture.

Reflecting on new formats in cultural public policy at the local level.
